DUN SINANE IN CHAOS; MACBETH 'GOES NUTS'

Lady Macbeth fails to stop unhinged CEO's "murder" rant being caught on camera

by WEIRD SISTERS

THE EVENT was meant to herald a new dawn. Instead, it plunged the Royal Bank of Dunsinane further into its endless waking nightmare.

Lady Macbeth had arranged for her husband, the bank's new CEO and Chairman, to address RBD shareholders via the City Times TV channel. His speech would close the chapter on the past and light a beacon of hope for the future.

Unofficially titled "Tomorrow and Tomorrow and Tomorrow," Macbeth's rallying cry would be heard beyond the outward walls of RBD and across the whole City.

Instead, it was an unmitigated disaster. Macbeth, quite frankly, lost it. Just as cameras began to roll, he stared wildly around the studio and began ranting.

Precisely who he was talking to or what he was saying was difficult to make out. Lady Macbeth forced the crew to stop filming, and only a few seconds of footage were preserved.

They show Macbeth reeling around in a feverish state, gibbering about "blood", "graves" and "murder." One member of the film crew – a colleague at this paper – thinks she heard something even more revealing.

"He definitely said 'Banquo,'" the journalist told me shortly after the filming was stopped. "Something about 'the spirit of Banquo'. But he was also babbling about armed rhinoceroses, so it could be nothing."

Reports of the words "murder" and "Banquo" tumbling out of Macbeth's mouth will do nothing to allay suspicions that he had a hand in his friend's vicious death.

Meanwhile, although the financial situation of the bank remains perilous, Macbeth has refused all calls to accept the Bank of England's offer of emergency funding.

His pride and single-mindedness may be great assets on the trading floor, but whether they serve him well as CEO is less certain. It is not just the fate of his own bank that Macbeth has in his hands. If Dunsinane goes down, it will pull investors, banks, and even governments across the globe down with it. The longer he bats away offers of help, the more likely it is that the Treasury will step in and force a bailout.

City Times Issues Rallying Call to Top Banker Macbeth: Be Bloody Bold and Resolute

EDITOR-IN-CHIEF HECATE

IF THE Royal Bank of Dunsinane sinks, it will create a swirling vortex that will suck us all down with it. The world as we know it will be destroyed.

Interdependency is a hard fact in international finance. Some may argue that the banks have become sausage machines, spitting out debt chipolatas whose minced contents are of uncertain origin.

But a sausage machine is an efficient piece of equipment. Money moves around the world like never before.

In this interdependent world, the greatest enemy is fear. It spreads contagiously, like rats on a ship.

In choppy waters, you need a firm, even arrogant hand on the tiller. So this paper says to Macbeth: have the courage to dispense with anyone who seeks to sow the seeds of saucy doubt.

Now is not the time to weigh one opinion carefully against another. Be bloody, bold and resolute! Only you are in a position to see Dunsinane through the most difficult period in its long history. Conquer your fears, and let no-one have power over you.
